

I believe that Avigdor Loveman's plan for a Palestinian state is fantastic. But his party seems to be embroiled in a disgraceful corruption scandal. Should I vote for them nevertheless?

I believe that all Arabs have been treated badly in Israel – the Palestinian Arabs, and the Jewish Arabs (often known as Mizrachim, the Jews who came from Arab lands such as Yemen, Morocco, Iraq). Golda's party fights for the rights of Palestinians. But Golda's party is also historically poor when it comes to discrimination against Mizrachim. Should I vote for her anyway?

This whole coalition system makes it totally impossible to govern. This is the second general election we've had in less than two years. Only Benjamin Netanyahu is campaigning on changing the system, and it's essential. But Netanyahu has been Prime Minister for seven years now, and never did anything to change the system up until now. Do I trust him to make the change now?

I hate Godgave. I can't bear Myson or her partner in crime Hurtz. All the others are just as corrupt as one another.

I think this country is going to the dogs.

That's it – I'm not going to vote at all. Okay?

I believe that Tzipi Myson is the only politician committed to the Peace process. I voted for her last time round. But this time she has teamed up with the Labor Party, that is filled with socialists. I believe in the Peace Process, but I also believe in the free market. If Myson wins, then so do the socialists. What should I do?

The new Everything party of Moshe Blueness is a real breath of fresh air. Blueness has a proven track record in breaking up monopolies and letting the common person make a living wage at last. But he is likely to join a coalition led by Prime Minister Godgave, and I think Godgave is terrible when it comes to the peace process. And no one will make a living if we're constantly at war.

Should I vote for Blueness nevertheless?

I really like the way that Nathan Bent says we Jews should “stop apologizing”. The world is anti-Semitic, and we Jews should stand up for ourselves since no one else will. But he is also dead against gay marriage, and is big on pushing orthodox Judaism. Should I still vote for him?

I am not religious and I really care about the poor. But the only party that is talking about care for the poor, is Mr Lion's religious party – and they are also in favor of funding ultra-Orthodox yeshivot. But I am secular, and against funding the ultra-Orthodox.

Should I still vote for Mr Lion?

The Dilemma Cards

Even though many other parties pay lip-service to religious pluralism, the only party that has really done anything about it is Lighting the Lamp. It's just that while I think religious pluralism is important, it's still not as important to me as the Conflict, and the economy – two issues Lighting the Lamp have not succeeded on at all. But without them in government, Israel will become even more orthodox and narrow. Should I still vote for them, or for a party with less commitment to pluralism but more in line with my views on the Conflict and the economy?

I think that Benjamin Netanyahu is the best person to defend Israel against Iran, the UN, and the Palestinians. But I think his economic policies are cruel and forcing tens of thousands into poverty. Should I still vote for him?

I don't believe in nationalism and I don't believe in capitalism. I believe in Jewish workers and Arab workers acting hand in hand. But my party has just merged with two other Arab parties – one has an Arab Nationalist take, and the other is Religious Muslim. The merged list is still the only Jewish-Arab one in town. Should I vote for them still?
